Bletchley Park Trust Board welcomes two new Trustees

Jane Bleach, experienced Chartered Accountant and business consultant, and Hywel Mathias, global hospitality and leisure operator, have been appointed to the Board of Trustees at Bletchley Park. Jane Bleach said: "I am absolutely inspired by the history of Bletchley Park and fascinated by its part in shaping today's digital age. I am excited at the prospect of bringing my enthusiasm and experience to the Board and contributing to achieving the Trust's vision – that Bletchley Park will be recognised worldwide not just for its role in World War Two but also for the continuing relevance of its historical achievements today."

Hywel Mathias said: "It's with great pleasure and enthusiasm I am joining the Bletchley Park Board of Trustees. I look forward to working with them over the coming years as we continue Bletchley Park Trust's mission to attract, engage and educate people from all over the world in order to inspire them with Bletchley Park's crucial role in World War Two."

The Trust's vision is that Bletchley Park will be recognised and acknowledged worldwide for the achievements that took place here in World War Two, and how and why these remain relevant today.

Bletchley Park is a vibrant heritage attraction and museum, open daily to visitors.

It was the home of British World War Two codebreaking; a place where technological innovation and human endeavour came together to make ground-breaking achievements that have helped shape the world we live in today.

This unique site was previously a vast Victorian estate, where parts including the Mansion still survive, expanding during wartime to accommodate Codebreakers' Huts and Blocks.

During World War Two, the Government Code and Cypher School (GC&CS), now known as the Government Communications Headquarters (GCHQ), was based at Bletchley Park. It grew from a small team of specialists to a vast intelligence factory of thousands of dedicated women and men. This extraordinary combination of brilliant and determined people and cutting-edge
